In the end, up started the Premier, who, having nothing to say, was manly, and candid, and liberal; gave credit to his adversaries and took credit to himself, and then the motion was withdrawn. While all this was going on, some made a note some made a bet, some consulted a book, some their ease, some yawned, a few slept. Yet, on the whole, there was an air about the assembly which can be smaller galery, just beneath us, sit the parliamentary lowers of the late Sir Robert Peel. reporters. Exactly opposite us is the THRONE; its splender we but faintly perceive, for it is veiled from vulgar eyes, but there it is-the very spot done what other Lord Chancellors have done, viz., of place. He has no fitting opposite wielded the fierce democracy of the lower house, tering from, the extraordinary individual who has just darted on the woolsack, as if he would edge of the Chancellor and take his very seat. That individual we need not name: a glance at the nose and plaid trousers are sufficient. It must be my universality. No other man would attempt to do what he is now doing, talking law with one man, posities with another, and secondal with a third, and all the while listening to the debate and qualifying himself to take a part in it. In the course of time we shall see him pursuing an erratic career in any part of the house except in that one part in which sit ministers and their supporters. Amongst their ranks Lord Brougham is never to be found. To the party in power he is always opposed. It is his pride that he never worships the rising sun. The Ex-Chancellor has never forgotton or forgiven the treatment he received, but it does not affect his health-it does not tinge his life with melancholy. He does not let consumption, like a worm in the bud, prey upon his damask cheek. His hair is a little gayer-has face is a little fatter-that is all the change the wear and tear of half a century of public life has produced-and of such a balt centary-the half century that waged war with France -triumphed at Waterloo-carried Reform-repealed the corn laws, and saw the births of railthe excitement of which wore out our Romillys, Follets, and Horners, with premature decay. Yet Brougham still lives. Slightly altering Byron, we may say of him,-

Time writes no wrinkles on his brazen brow, Such as the Edinburgh's dawn beheld, he wriggleth now.

Below the woolsack is a table, and on each side are ranged the orators and partisans of two great sections which, under some name or other, always have existed, and always will exist in our national history. The unmittated call them Conservatives men who are in office, and the men who are not. The Government for the time being, sits on the right hand of the Lord Chancellor, who acts as Speaker, and who has a far easier birth of it, than Mr. Shaw Lefevre.
